Russia is rife with Nazis. Putin's propagandists like @Bucleor and @DomLucre can't make a "Nazi" supercut without adding Russian Nazis. 📌

1. Alexei "Fly" Maximov is from St Petersburg's "Totenkopf" Nazi group. Hired to impersonate Ukrainians, Maximov has a "Made In St Petersburg" tattoo on the back of his head. (Remember his group's T-shirt. This will be important later.)

And the International Court of Justice rejected the claim that Russia has committed genocide. So, yeah, you're debunked again.

I left St. Petersburg on April 28. One day later, FAN published an article with the headline “What Does a New York Times Journalist Have in Common With a Nazi From St. Petersburg?” The story detailed a mysterious meeting in St. Petersburg between a New York Times journalist — me — and a neo-Nazi. Its lead image was a photo of a skinhead giving an enthusiastic Nazi salute. But it was not just any skinhead. It was the skinhead whom Katarina Aistova brought to our meeting and introduced to me as her brother. As I learned from reading the article, Aistova’s “brother” was in fact a notorious neo-Nazi named Alexei Maximov.

The article explained that Maximov, who goes by the nickname Fly, is a member of Totenkopf, a prominent skinhead group in St. Petersburg. He reportedly served nine years in prison for stabbing a man to death. Just a month before I met him, Maximov again made headlines when, during an investigation into beatings of immigrants around St. Petersburg, the police found weaponry and Nazi paraphernalia in his apartment.

The story made no mention of Katarina Aistova or the Internet Research Agency. Instead, the article claimed I met with Maximov because I wanted his help in creating a provocation against Russia. Maximov told FAN that I requested to meet position allowing for direct contact with the officials behind the Kremlin funds. It is an open secret among Kremlin-minded propagandists in Estonia that certain members of the Coordination Council of Russian Compatriots, which is managed by the Russian Embassy, receive the bulk of the grants paid by the Russian state funds. The best way to receive grants is to share them with Russian officials and diplomats. A characteristic example of the Kremlin's financial scheme is the funding of the Baltiyskiy Mir publication, which has several contributors in Estonia. The Russian Embassy in Estonia paid USD 30,000 to publish the 2016 issue. However, the publication was not issued at all in 2016. The grants offer a lifestyle and source of income for certain people. Unfortunately, this kind of corrupt mentality has its impact on Estonia. It is quite typical that the money is used for ostensible business in Estonia involving attempts at tax evasion.

Sticking labels on Estonia is also typical. We have noticed a tendency to delegate right-wing extremists from Russia to Estonian events in order to publicly display Nazi symbols, which leads to media coverage of this "social problem" in Estonia. One of the best examples from last year is the attempted provocation where the Saint Petersburg skinhead Aleksei Maksimov was sent to Estonia to be captured on film as a "local Nazi activist". Maksimov crossed the border dressed in clothes that covered his arms and legs, but when going to the memorial event for those who fell in the Battle for the Tannenberg Line, he changed into clothes that revealed his neo-Nazi tattoos, including a swastika. The Kremlin-controlled media was naturally eager to pick this up as an example of events in Estonia. As they had to send in an activist from Saint Petersburg to play the role, it showed that the label was difficult to stick and the methods suggest desperation.

Security agency: Russia sent own right-wing extremists to Estonia for Nazi labeling

Sticking labels on Estonia is typical for Russian propaganda and there have been cases where right-wing extremists have been brought in from Russia to display Nazi symbols during Estonian events, Estonia's Internal Security Service (ISS) says in its yearbook for 2016 published on Wednesday.

"We have noticed a tendency to delegate right-wing extremists from Russia to Estonian events in order to publicly display Nazi symbols, which leads to media coverage of this 'social problem' in Estonia. One of the best examples from last year is the attempted provocation where the St. Petersburg skinhead Aleksei Maksimov was sent to Estonia to be captured on film as a 'local Nazi activist'," the yearbook says.

1c. More Nazis wearing Alexei Maximov's "Totenkopf St Petersburg" club shirt. Confused Ukrainians? More Russian infiltrators? Propagandists don't care. Fun fact: "Totenkopf" released a 2021 Nazi album called "Made In St. Petersburg".
